

:: THE FERNALESE WORDLIST :: Bruce Rimell

This is the Fernalese Wordlist, a directory of all created Fernalese words along with approximate English translations. This list is designed to be searchable, and the Fernalese term is given along with a variety of English translations. Given that the lexical space of Fernalese is vastly different from English, these translations are often imprecise and Fernal lexemes often have vastly different territories to the nearest English equivalents. Note for example the translations for cuan, fer and tzer cover a range of English concepts.

Thus when searching for the translation of a particular English word, it is best to search several times and move down through the list to see if several words exist to cover similar lexical spaces in English. A good example is the English word 'touch', for which three translations – pero, piatz and sair – exist: each of these offers a different shade of meaning to the English translation. There are also words for which no English equivalent exists – a search for 'consciousness' will reveal words for different states of consciousness which require explanations rather than translations.

Entries preceded by an asterisk (*) are written or spelled irregularly – these included irregular forms beginning with ch- (*char for example being spelled c-ha-r rather than the expected ca-r) or words ending in -tz or -tx which combine with a following vowel (usually -e). Entries preceded by a circumflex (^) are words from the ancestral language Danixao – see the Appendix on this.

Entries preceded by a dash (-) are bound morphemes only, usually for name elements or affixes, and entries followed by a bracketed letter and a dash show the form of the word in combination, for example cantx(e)- is cantx but combines as cantxe- before a consonant.
